The judges were raised up by the Lord, especially during the times of spiritual decline or apostasy. The Lord raised up judges to deliver the people from their enemies, and to preserve or bringing back to the covenant, in order to accomplish his purpose. The term "judge" (Hebrew: שופט, shofet) in the context of the book of Judges refers to a military leader, a ruler, or a person who holds a position of authority, rather than a formal judicial role. The term "judge" carries a broader, more general meaning than just judicial decision-making. It encompasses leadership, governance, and the exercise of power over a group of people. The term "judge" in the context of the Bible and ancient Near Eastern culture, carries a broader meaning than just a judicial role. The scriptural qualifications for the judgeship were that they be Hebrew men who were "able men, such as fear God, men of truth, hating covetousness" (Exodus 18:21). Moses was instructed to select these men to be officers over thousands, hundreds, fifties, and tens to judge the people.

Although the nature of the function discharged by the judges is not distinctly defined by the scriptures, it is evident that they were not merely civil magistrates, but were also, in a certain sense, the ministers of God, who had been appointed to deliver the people from their oppressors, the "officer" of judge was not hereditary as was the priesthood. It was conferred upon those who were called to it by the spirit of God, and who, by their zeal and faith, were qualified to become leaders of the people in war, and to rule the people in peace. The term "judge" in the context of the Bible and ancient Near Eastern culture, carries a broader meaning than just judicial decision-making. It encompasses leadership, governance, and the exercise of power over a group of people. The term "judge" in the context of the Bible and ancient Near Eastern culture, carries a broader meaning than just a judicial role. The judges were called upon to lead and govern the people, not just to make legal decisions.

Since the judge had succeeded in bringing the people to a state that no 1 Ezra 10:1-44; 2 Chronicles 29:1-36; 30:1-27; 31:1-21; 34:1-33; 35:1-19; Nehemiah 8:1-18; 9:1-38; 10:1-39; 13:1-31; Ezra 9:1-15; 10:1-44 could dare to oppose them, the people were called upon to depart and dwell in their cities, each man upon his own inheritance, and to serve God with their wives and with their daughters. This having been done, the people were called upon to depart and dwell in their cities, each man upon his own inheritance, and to serve God with their wives and with their daughters.

Therefore, it was not in the civil sense of the word that these people were referred to as judges, but in the sense of being the men who had been called to be the leaders of God's people, and who had been qualified by the spirit of God to be the ministers of God's people. The term "judge" in the context of the Bible and ancient Near Eastern culture, carries a broader meaning than just judicial decision-making. It encompasses leadership, governance, and the exercise of power over a group of people. The term "judge" in the context of the Bible and ancient Near Eastern culture, carries a broader meaning than just a judicial role. The term "judge" in the context of the Bible and ancient Near Eastern culture, carries a broader meaning than just a judicial role. The term "judge" in the context of the Bible and ancient Near Eastern culture, carries a broader meaning than just a judicial role.

The first major chronological problem in the period of the judges is that of the duration. As the book of Judges is arranged, it would seem that the period of the judges covered a little more than three hundred years. Paul's speech in Acts 13:20 states that the period covered by the judges was "about 450 years." Jephthah's speech in Judges 11:26 states that Israel had been in Heshbon and its cities for "three hundred